

5 reasons why you may prefer working on a desktop at home.

The current crisis means that many of us are working from home. But even after things get back to normal, it's expected that lots of people will carry on spending at least part of their week working away from the office.

With home now a permanent place of work, you will see the big advantages of the larger screen, keyboard and processor that a desktop can provide.

1. Agile working

Having two permanent places of work means there's less travelling between home and the office - helping to save time, money and the environment. So there's less need for a portable computer.

4. Larger screen and keyboard

Bigger screens, particularly Lenovo's incredible high-resolution screens, are much easier to work on than smaller screens, especially if you're working with spreadsheets or CAD.

2. Better value

Choose a desktop computer over a portable and you can get a lot more for your money. Desktops often offer a higher spec for a lower price than laptops.

5. Quicker, easier and cheaper to repair

Because you're not moving your desktop computer around, unlike a portable, you're less likely to drop it or damage it. But even if you do, it's much cheaper and easier to get and install replacement parts for a desktop.

3. Larger, more powerful processor

Generally, desktop computers can fit in a lot more processing power than laptops. So you can get through more work, faster.

Whether you are running a small business or the IT department of a large enterprise, the many benefits of Lenovo's desktops makes them the perfect choice as a home-office solution.
